Ultimately, the claim that all of reality is a simulation is something that cannot be proved, at least not in philosophical or scientific terms. This is mostly due to the self-defeating nature of solipsism: the more sure we are that our experiences are false, the less we can trust those experiences—including the experiences that lead us to believe in solipsism!

The problem with simulation theory and as a matter of fact, any theory, is that it creates a distinction. Anything that creates a distinction, is not the ultimate reality. The difference between an enlightened person and a regular person (warped by his own illusion) is that the enlightened person can see through all distinctions.
